

CLASSICAL MUSIC IN AN AGE OF POP

Greg Sandow

Spring 2017

phone: 646 484-8163

email me

my website

my blog on the future of classical music

find me on Facebook

find me on Twitter

course overview

Class Schedule and Assignments

You should read this every week, to find out what we're going to do in our next class, and what your assignments for that class will be. For most of our classes, you'll have reading to do, and maybe music to listen to and videos to watch. Everything you have to read, hear, or watch is online. Just click the links.

You'll also have written assignments (short papers), and presentations to do in class. I've alerted you to these in boldface type, a week before they're due.

This schedule might change, depending on how long some of our discussions take. The assignments might change, too, because I might get new ideas – maybe from you! – of what I want to teach. I'll email all updates.

And one last thing. If you're reading the assignments for any week and come to a page break, please scroll down past the break. There may be more for that week on the next page.

January 11

Introduction to this course. I'll tell you about myself, and about the course. Then I'll ask you all to tell me about yourselves.

January 18

The crisis in classical music

reading:

classical music before the crisis:

Greg Sandow, "Before the crisis" (a post from my blog)

Greg Sandow, "When opera was popular" (another post from my blog)

In 1923, Geraldine Farrar, a popular soprano, retired from singing. She gave a farewell performance at the Met Opera. Which a famous soprano might do today. But – as a New York Times article on the event shows – a farewell performance in 1923 was a much bigger thing than it would be now. Farrar had teenage fans, and they went wild, hanging a banner from the Met Opera balcony and throwing flowers on the stage. Reading about this is like taking a trip to another world, a world that really did exist, in which the classical music audience was young.)

“One and Two and...” (Life magazine, June 29, 1962.

Again a trip to another world. Life, in 1962, was one of America’s most popular magazines. Here it celebrates the piano, complete with a piano piece it commissioned from Copland, and printed for its readers to play.)

[To find this, follow the link, which takes you to the June 29, 1962 issue of Life, as archived on Google Books. The story on the piano starts on page 38 of that issue. To go there, find the words “Front Cover” in small print just above the full reproduction of the cover of the magazine. Click the down arrow next to those words, and find the link to the story, either by looking for its title – “One and Two and...” – or by looking for page 38.]

the crisis now:

Greg Sandow, “Portrait of a crisis” (blog post)

Greg Sandow, “Timeline of the crisis” (blog post)

I did this post in 2012, so that’s where the timeline ends. In class I’ll update it with things that have happened since then.

David Pitt, “Piano Stores Closing as Fewer Children Taking Up Instrument” (news story from the Associated Press, January 2, 2015)

This news story from two years ago shows one way in which classical music is vanishing from our mainstream culture. Contrast this with the Life magazine article. So many people buying pianos and playing them in 1962, so few in our time.

January 25

What is classical music? Why should it survive?

Some definitions of classical music, and comments about it, from various sources

Here are three strong statements by famous classical musicians, about the value of classical music. I’ve quoted one of the statements below. The others can be found in the assigned readings:

Kyle MacMillan, “Violinist Zukerman decries sad state of classical music,” (Denver Post, November 15, 2007)

Daniel Barenboim, speaking of a recording of the Beethoven symphonies that he made with the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra, as part of a project called “Beethoven for All”:

Many people feel or think, without really knowing, that music is somehow elitist – that it is for people who can afford the money and the time; it’s something that has only to do with leisure. But music is not elitist. On the contrary. Music is not only not elitist, music is universal. Even though all the great composers of the past are European, music doesn’t speak only to Europeans. (I was born in Argentina; if I were limited to “my” music, I could only play tango!) This music, although it was written by Beethoven in Bonn or in Vienna, speaks to people in Ramallah, in Australia, and everywhere else. This is why it is not elitist. Music is for all, for everybody – everybody who opens their mind and heart to it. It needs that curiosity, and it needs attentive listening, but then it’s for all. And if you ask people who do not think of themselves as musically inclined: “Who do you know?” they all say, “Beethoven.” So if we want music for all, then it must be Beethoven.

David Finckel and Wu Han, “Classical Radio’s Fade-Out” (New York Times, April 20, 2002)

What do you think of these three statements? Do they make sense? Why? Or why not? And – maybe most important – how would these statements strike someone who doesn’t listen to classical music, and doesn’t value it as much as we do? I’ll ask you to give your answers in class.

February 1

Classical music and the rest of our culture

reading:

Marcus Westbury, “Mozart cover bands rake in the moolah” (Sydney [Australia] Morning Herald, October 18, 2007)

A challenge to classical music. Or, specifically, to classical music funding. Why should orchestras and opera companies get so much money, when other things in our society – including other arts – get so much less?

Greg Sandow, “Who Is Our Competition?” published in Chamber Music magazine, fall 2015

In which I suggest that if we want a new classical music audience, we’ll have to compete with everything else in our culture.

Richard Florida, excerpts from The Rise of the Creative Class

What do educated, creative, artistic younger people – your age and in their 30s – like to do when they go out at night? Richard Florida, a business consultant, offers some thoughts on that in a book that became famous for its analysis of a new kind of creative younger people. Nightlife isn’t his main subject, but what he says is worth reading. If he’s right, then that’s a serious problem for classical music. Because the people Florida describes don’t sound like they’d care about most of what we offer.

Greg Sandow, “The walls are coming down” (blog post about a festival of vocal music at the Kennedy Center, created by Renée Fleming, and including music in many genres)

Michael Cooper, “Celebrating David Bowie, A Star Who Burned Bright to the Last” (New York Times, January 11, 2015)

A pop star dies, and he was considered so important that the New York Times did more than 20 stories about him, in the days just after his death.

This is one of them. As you'll see, Bowie had a tremendous influence on peoples' lives. Could anything in classical music have such an impact?

listening:

Three pop songs about the African-American experience.

African-American culture is central to life in contemporary America. But you won't encounter much of it – if any – in opera houses and classical concert halls. There we engage with 18th and 19th century culture, but not with much that's happening now.

Pop music is different. It lives in our present world, and ever since the 1950s, African-American music and life has played a big part in it.

Here are three examples. What do you think of these songs? Would you agree that they offer something – both a cultural and an artistic experience – that classical music doesn't give us?

Chuck Berry, "Brown-eyed Handsome Man" (1956)

read the lyrics

We take rock music for granted today. But when it first appeared, in the 1950s (and was called rock & roll), it was revolutionary. Black musicians, who up to then were mainly heard by a black audience, emerged into the pop music mainstream, and white people listened to them.

In this song, Chuck Berry, one of the great rock pioneers (who's black), playfully sang about how cool it was to be black. He did it in a kind of code, but everyone knew what he meant. When he sings "brown-eyed handsome man," just understand that he's really talking about brown skin. Revolutionary for 1956!

(Note, by the way, his reference to visual art, to a famous sculpture called "Venus de Milo," a statue of Venus whose arms somehow got lost.)

Sam Cooke, "A Change is Gonna Come" (1963)

read the lyrics

In the 1950s, Sam Cooke became a famous gospel singer, which means that he sang and recorded religious music used in black churches. When the rise of rock & roll allowed black singers to enter the pop mainstream, Cooke thought he'd try it, and had great success. He had many pop hits, aimed at white teenagers.

But in the 1960s, he suddenly got serious. He was deeply influenced by the civil rights movement, which was fighting to give African-Americans things we now take for granted – the right to vote, for instance, and in general to have the same opportunities that white people have.

With this on his mind, he wrote and recorded what became his most famous song. (And which in my opinion is one of the greatest pop songs ever, and in fact for me is one of the most moving pieces of music in any genre.) Its name tells you all you have to know.

Grandmaster Flash & the Furious Five, “The Message” (1982)

read the lyrics

This song is one of the earliest hip-hop classics, the first rap song to be played on mainstream pop radio. Which means it was the first rap song many white people heard. I vividly remember what a shock it was to hear it on the radio. Here was a new kind of voice, bringing us a message from a place we didn't know much about. Conditions in the urban black community weren't great in 1982, and Grandmaster Flash told us all about it, in both words and a tone of voice that no one could forget.

Written assignment, due in two parts.

First part, due next week, February 8: we'll discuss your ideas for this assignment in class. So think about the assignment, and be ready with ideas!

Second part, due the week after next, February 15: You'll write your ideas in a short paper – they might change after our class discussion – and email the paper to me.

Here's the assignment:

Bearing in mind what we've read and discussed about the value of classical music, and about its place in our culture, please answer the following questions.

- Why do you think classical music should survive?
- What does it offer the world, that nothing else can offer?

How long should this be? You could write a page on each question. Or two sentences on each! Your choice. It can be harder to write something short, because you have to focus your thoughts. But one advantage of writing something short is...well, that you focus your thoughts. You zero in on what's most important to you. Take your choice. Write a sentence or two, write a paragraph, write a page. Whatever you need..

But this is the most important thing:

I want you to aim what you write on the people Richard Florida describes. Smart, creative younger people, with wide interests, involved with popular culture, but open to anything, Why should these people listen to classical music? They already have full cultural lives. What will they get from classical music that they aren't already getting?

Think hard about this. And try to avoid easy answers. In the many years I've taught this course, many students have told me they think classical music is the deepest, most artistic kind of music there is. I respect that belief. But is this what Richard Florida's people believe? And what will their reaction be, if you say such a thing to them?

If you think they might not believe what you say – even if you're sure it's true! – what can you say to them, about classical music, that they will believe?

These are important questions. Because if we want to go out in the world and advocate for classical music, we have to say things that will convince other people. So how do we do that?

Feel free to write in a normal, everyday, informal style. This isn't a formal paper!

Please email your paper—and all other written assignments — to me at greg@gregsandow.com. If you're going to be late with an assignment, you must let me know in advance, so we can set another due date.

And also:

Please put your name in the title of your paper. That makes it much easier for me to find your work after I've gotten it.

And if you send your paper as an email attachment — as most of you do — please send from your personal email account, if you can. There's a strange problem with Juilliard's email system. I have a Mac, and attachments sent from Juilliard's system can't be read on a Mac without taking extra steps. Weird, but true. If you send from your personal account, I won't have that trouble. So thanks for helping me out!

February 8

Classical music in the past (1)

This week we'll see that classical music wasn't always formal. The audience wasn't at all silent. It applauded or cried out when it heard music it liked. Musicians didn't stick to the written notes. They ornamented the music they played, they improvised, and they welcomed audience participation. Mozart, as you'll see, even designed one of his symphonies to make the audience applaud, while the music was playing.

reading:

James H. Johnson, Listening in Paris, excerpt from chapter 1, about Baroque opera in Paris, and its noisy audience

Some descriptions of performances in past centuries, from various sources
excerpt from a letter Mozart wrote to his father on July 3, 1778, about the premiere of his Paris Symphony

listening:

Mozart, Symphony No. 31, "Paris," first movement (Academy of Ancient Music; Jaap Schroeder, concertmaster, Christopher Hogwood, continuo.)

Wilhelm Backhaus, a great pianist from the last century, improvises a prelude to Schumann's "Das Abend"

This was recorded at Backhaus's last recital, which he played in 1969 in Carinthia, Austria. First there's an announcement from the stage, saying in German that Backhaus isn't well, and won't play the scheduled work, Beethoven's Op. 111 sonata. Instead, he'll play a short Schumann piece, which we then hear, starting with the improvised prologue.

February 15

Classical music in the past (2)

Old recordings will show us how lively and personal, how spontaneous and individual — at least in my view — classical musicians were in past generations.

listening:

Mozart, Le Nozze di Figaro, overture (live 1940 performance by the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, Ettore Panizza, conductor)

Beethoven, Archduke Trio, first movement: Jacques Thibaud, violin, Pablo Casals, cello, Alfred Cortot, piano (recorded in 1928)

Optional: you might also like to hear these musicians play the first movement of the Schubert B flat trio. Not as controlled a performance, but maybe freer, and thus more typical of performances from that era.

Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto, second movement: Joseph Szigeti, violin, with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham, conductor (1933)

Schubert, "Serenade," sung in English by Richard Crooks (1941)

videos:

Puccini, La bohème, end of Act 1: sung by Jussi Björling and Renata Tebaldi, with the Showcase Symphony Orchestra, Max Rudolf, conductor (from Festival of Music, broadcast live in 1956 on network TV, complete with car commercials)

Bizet, Carmen, "Toreador Song," sung in Italian (instead of French) by Gino Bechi (from Mad About Opera, a 1950 Italian film)

Gregor Piatigorsky ends a recital with an arrangement of "The Swan," from Carnival of the Animals (from Carnegie Hall, a 1947 Hollywood movie)

Artur Schnabel plays DeFalla's "Ritual Fire Dance" (also from Carnegie Hall; Schnabel's performance is wonderfully theatrical, but he doesn't exactly play what DeFalla wrote)

February 22

Pop Music

reading:

Peter Guralnick, excerpt from Sweet Soul Music. About Aretha Franklin recording "I Never Loved a Man (The Way I Love You)," her first big hit. This will show you one way that pop records are produced:

listen to the song

This excerpt from a very detailed book starts in the middle of Aretha Franklin's story. So you may be confused at first about what's going on.

Here's what you need to know. Jerry Wexler, a record producer from New York, signed Aretha Franklin to a contract and brought her to a studio in the south to record. He hired musicians – guitar, piano, drum, bass, horns (a pop music term meaning saxophones and brass instruments) – to record with her.

The recording session began with Aretha (people in pop music always call her by her first name) sitting at the piano, singing and playing a song she wanted to record. She was so impressive that the piano player hired for the session immediately said that she should play the piano instead of him.

And things went on from there, with the horn players going to another room to work out what they would play. So what you hear on the record is a cooperative enterprise, worked out by all the musicians together.

When you hear the song, listen for the entrance of the horns. Can you believe that these musicians, all on their own, planned something so perfectly right (at least in my opinion), and that – when the horns start playing offbeats – gets so dramatic?

listening:

Frank Sinatra, "I've Got You Under My Skin" (from Songs for Swingin' Lovers, 1956)

Lucinda Williams, "Ventura" (from World Without Tears, 2003)

James Brown, "Get Up \(I Feel Like Being a\) Sex Machine" (single, 1970)

Björk, "An Echo, A Stain" (from Vespertine, 2002)

We all agree that classical music is art. But what is pop music? Listen to these songs, and think about how you'd classify them. Clearly they're not classical music, but why? What are the differences? What makes them pop, and not classical?

And could they be art? If not, why not?

If these songs are art, they pose a serious challenge to classical music. People in our culture listen to pop music. If it's giving them art, why do they need what we're offering them?

We'll talk about all this in class.

March 1, March 6 – spring break

March 15

Fixing the crisis: Some ideas, and some things that people have done video:

Greg Sandow, keynote talk at the 21CMPosium, held at the DePauw School of Music, September, 2016

This was a conference about what it means to be a 21st century classical musician, and what conservatories should do to prepare classical musicians for the contemporary world. In my keynote talk, I tried to lay out the current condition of classical music, and what needs to change.

reading:

Greg Sandow, "Four Keys to the Future"

A long list of new things that classical musicians and classical music institutions have tried, assembled from various sources (including my own experience)

Sarah Robinson, "How the classical world went clubbing" (Guest post on my blog by someone who wrote a doctoral dissertation about classical musicians who've played in clubs, after playing in clubs for many years herself. The post is in two parts, here and here.)

new kinds of performances, new kinds of music (audio and video):

Dan Tepfer, The Goldberg Variations Variations, excerpt. (Jazz pianist Dan Tepfer plays the Goldberg Variations, and instead of repeating the aria and each variation, as the score indicates, he plays improvisations on them. This recording was made some years ago. I heard Dan play this live recently, and his performance has grown greatly.)

Tchaikovsky, Violin Concerto, third movement (Patricia Kopatchinskaja, violin; MusicAeterna, Theodor Currentzis conducting)

Guillaume de Machaut, Messe de Notre Dame, "Kyrie" (A famous medieval piece, sung by Ensemble Organum, a vocal ensemble whose members don't believe that medieval musicians sang with the pure classical voices we favor today.)

Caroline Shaw, Partita for Eight Voices, first movement, "Allemande"

The Pulitzer Prize is America's highest honor in composition, and in 2013 Caroline Shaw became the youngest composer ever to win it. She won it for the Partita, which she wrote for A Roomful of Teeth, a vocal ensemble she sings in. This is a live performance at the Music on Main series in Vancouver. The video I've linked to is of the entire piece. Your assignment is only to watch the first movement, which ends at 5:45. Of course if you like it and want to watch the rest, feel free! If you like the first movement, I think you'll like the rest of the piece even more.

This is an example of a style of composition very common among young American composers. Very free, very relaxed, very informal, using any kind of harmony — and, in fact, any kind of sound — the composer likes.

Debussy, Afternoon of a Faun, University of Maryland Symphony Orchestra.

As played from memory, without a conductor — and danced by the student musicians. A video that just about went viral in the classical music world. Liz Lerman, a very original choreographer, designed the dancing, building it around movements the musicians were comfortable making. James Ross, whom you might know from Juilliard's conducting program, conceived the project and led the music rehearsals.)

March 22

Creativity and careers What should conservatories teach? What should all of you be learning? How creative can you be in your careers?

You'll have reading assignments for this class, and I think you'll find them interesting. All of them are about new ways to train musicians. Some of them may be provocative. Certainly they're different from what goes on at Juilliard. It'll be interesting to discuss all this in class. Since we're talking about something we're all intimately involved in, this discussion might be especially hot.

reading:

Ivan Trevino, "My Pretend Music School" (blog post by a percussionist)

Greg Sandow, "A Stunning Manifesto" (blog post about new ideas at the University of Maryland School of Music)

Greg Sandow, "Path-breaking piano curriculum" (blog post about what piano students do at Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, Ontario; they improvise, and play music in many genres)

DePauw University School of Music (where the curriculum has been radically revised to focus on training entrepreneurial musicians):

Greg Sandow, Revolution at DePauw, from my blog, about the early days of – as they call it – the 21CM curriculum (meaning 21st Century Classical Musician)

“21CM at DePauw”

A short video about the goals of the program. The trio you see playing is Project Trio, whose bassist, Peter Seymour, once played in the Cleveland Orchestra, and is the bass teacher at DePauw. All three members of the group are trained as classical musicians, but you couldn't call what they're playing classical music.

You'll see Yo Yo Ma playing a Bach movement to open a new space, and his participation is much more than a celebrity appearance. He's a big supporter of what's happening at DePauw, and is the chairman of the 21CM Advisory Board (which I'm also on).

The new space is a luxurious performance/party/teaching space downtown in Greencastle, IN, the town where DePauw is located. The idea was to bring the music school into its community, and the space has been so successful that the donors who funded it now have bought an adjoining building, so that even more can be done.

David Wallace, “Becoming Village People”

A talk at the 21CMPosium at DePauw. David is the chair of the string department at the Berklee College of Music in Boston. Where every student can and does study with every teacher, learning to play in many musical styles.

Two creative musicians describe their highly personal careers (in talks at the 21CMPosium):

Sarah Robinson, “How I Stopped Asking Permission to Have a Career in Music”

Mike Block, “Breaking Away from ‘Classical.’” (Another talk from 21CM. Mike is a cellist who often plays with his cello strapped to his chest, can dance while he plays, and plays world music as a member of the Silk Road Ensemble, as much as he plays classical.)

March 29

One way you can help fix the crisis: Entrepreneurship

reading:

Seth Godin, Tribes (excerpt)

Greg Sandow, “How to do it” (blog post)

Clive Thompson, “Sex, Drugs, and Updating Your Blog,” from the New York Times Magazine, May 13, 2007 (about how to promote a pop career all by yourself, on the web) entrepreneurial musicians:

Anderson & Roe (A piano duo. Both of them took this class, but I can't take credit for what they do. They were doing it long before they met me.)

Lara Downes:

“Walking the Walk” (how an entrepreneurial pianist in San Francisco got an audience for a concert series she created)

“Success and Surprises” (more on her concert series: how she drew a large audience to a performance by Christopher O’Riley)

Victoria Paterson, “Filling the House for New Music” (how the American Modern Ensemble, here in New York, sells out the house for new music concerts, and also pays its musicians very well)

Greg Sandow, “We personalize what music is” (blog post, in which Alecia Lawyer describes her entrepreneurial River Oaks Chamber Orchestra, now in its ninth season in Houston) assignment for two weeks from now, to be presented informally in class:

Pick a piece that you’ve performed, and that you really love. Come to class prepared to say why you love this piece. Imagine that you’re talking to people your own age, who don’t usually listen to classical music. What would you say to get them interested?

Be as personal as you like. In fact, the point is to talk in a personal way, about your thoughts and feelings, and about the very individual, even unique reasons why you love the piece you’re talking about. There’s no need to talk about the history of the piece, or its structure, unless these are things that truly excite you. Speak from your heart, in your own way.

A couple of rules. These presentations should be short. No more than five minutes!

And I don’t want you to play any musical examples. I know that these can be very important in a talk, and I’d encourage you to use them when you give talks like this to a real audience. In class, though, I want you to use words alone. Because that’s what we’re working on – how to present your love for a piece in a way that will convince people that they might love it, too. It’s easier to play a musical example than to speak. So we’ll focus on speaking.

April 5 – no class. I’ll be visiting the University of Texas in El Paso, to speak as part of the launch of their entrepreneurship program

April 12

Fixing the crisis: Taking one small step

You’ll give your presentations in class. If there’s not time for everyone, we’ll continue the presentations on April 19

April 19

Fixing the crisis: Shaping your brand (1)

reading:

Jade Simmons, “Are You a Victim of Artistic Identity Theft?” (a post from her “Emerge Already” blog)

Greg Sandow, "Sell What You Are" (blog post)

Greg Sandow, "How to Write a Press Release"

"Ghosts and Flowers: The Handel-Halvorsen Passacaglia" (A video made by two Juilliard graduates, Arianna Warsaw-Fan and Meta Weiss.)

"Handel Hits the Road!" (Daria van den Bercken, a Dutch pianist, goes on the streets of Amsterdam to promote her project of playing and recording Handel's keyboard music.)

I don't think these three musicians — Arianna, Meta, and Daria — meant to brand themselves with these videos. But still the videos (which are very different) serve as at least tentative branding. That's because they give anyone who watches a strong idea of what the people who made them might be like, as musicians and, maybe even as people.

How would you describe what you see in these videos? What would the videos make you expect from the three musicians in the future?

websites:

Look at these websites, and ask yourself how they make you feel. You don't have to look at any of them for a long time, and you don't have to look at anything except the home page (unless you want to).

The point is just to look at how each of these sites presents the group, institution, company, or town it represents. Does it make you want to go to these schools, hear these musicians, live in this town, buy what this company sells? And if you did go to the schools, hear the musicians, live in the town, buy what the company sells, what would your experience be?

You don't need to think very hard about this. Trust your first impressions. For instance: Zipcar is a company that rents cars for short periods of time, typically three to four hours. When you look at their homepage, do you get the idea that renting from them will be difficult? Or will it be very simple?

Why doing this is useful: Because in the future, or even now, you might want to promote yourself. And if you do, you want to do it in a way that makes people feel they want to go to the concerts or whatever else you're promoting.

Here are the websites I'd like you to look at:

Viktoria Mullova. Look at her photos. Especially my favorite, which is this one. So moody, not like a standard publicity shot. Makes me want to hear how she plays.

Juilliard

Curtis

Berklee College of Music

DePauw School of Music

Jack Quartet

Warwick, NY homepage (this is the town where my country house is)

Zipcar

assignment for next week, due April 26:

Write something down – a short phrase, a sentence, or simply a collection of words – that you could use to describe yourself as a musician. Words that sum up your musical essence.

You might want to think of more than one phrase, or more than one sentence. And don't worry if what you write doesn't seem perfect, or even if you think it's not very good. I'm not asking you to come up with something polished, something finished, something you can show the outside world. I'm just asking you to take a first step in describing yourself.

Also look for graphics that seem to evoke what you do. You can find them in print (in a magazine, for instance), or on the web. They can be photos, drawings, advertisements – anything. Most likely they won't be about you (unless you have a logo, or photos or drawings of yourself that you want to use). The idea is simply to find something visual that seems to inhabit the same world you do. What you find doesn't have to fit you perfectly. Like the words that you'll think of, they're just a first step.

Bring these materials – your phrase or phrases, and your graphics – to class. If you found graphics on the web, please print them out for all of us to see. We'll talk about what all of you bring, and see what your next step might be – your next step toward finding words and images that you really could use to define your personal brand.

April 26

Fixing the crisis: Shaping your brand (2)

You'll present your words and images in class. And we'll talk about shaping your personal brand.

assignment:

informal paper, due by email May 10, the date of our final class:

Imagine a concert you might give, that's an expression of your brand. By which I mean a concert that's entirely you, a concert that expresses the essence of your musical self, the same self that you've worked to capture in words and images. Describe the program, the setting (where you'd give the concert), and also how you'd promote the event. Everything – from the music you choose to the way you'd publicize the performance – should be an expression of everything that, as a person and as a musician, you care about most.

This paper might be three pages long. But, as before, write at whatever length – shorter than three pages, or longer -- that seems to make sense, to say what you want to say.

May 3: no class – jury week

May 10

Final discussion

informal paper due

